Every day we witness how vulnerable our dignity is: racism, sexism, xenophobia or homophobia make life hard. Children in school are being bullied, unemployed persons are being called "prosperity trash" or the elderly are insulted as »junk«.

Stephan Marks analyses the plenty degradations which poison our human relations and give way to depression, addiction, violence or suicide. The dedicated social scientist shows a number of practical opportunities for taking action, to be able to deal and work with people in a humane way.

About the author

Stephan Marks, Ph.D., is a sociologist and supervisor, with over 20 years' experience in continuing professional education. His areas of specialization are shame, human dignity, Nazism and collective memory. His seven-year-long research project Geschichte und Erinnerung ('History and Memory') addressed the motives of the Nazis' followers.
